HOW TO RUN A HOTEL

NEVER TAKE AN IDEA FROM ONE OF YOUR GUESTS.

The Sad Fate of Old Man McSweeney, Who Forgot That It is an Utter Impossibility to Please Everybody in the World.

"I should think it would be a good idea for hotel managers to invite suggestions from their guests," said a young man chatting at the counter of one of the big hostilities in the business section; "to put up boxes, y' know, the same as it is done in clubs."

"Great Scott!" exclaimed the clerk. "That was the very scheme that ruined old man McSweeney at the Prospect Lake House. Did y' ever hear of the case? No? Well, it was like this: The Prospect Lake was one of the finest summer hotels in the northwest, and old McSweeney got it on his hands through a loan. He knew nothing about the business, and naturally he introduced a lot of impractical ideas that caused continual kicking."

"One day the suggestion box scheme happened to pop into his head, and he immediately put one of 'em on every floor, conspicuously labeled, requesting advice from the guests for future guidance of the management."

"Say, I wish you could have seen how they jumped at the chance! Every crank in the house turned loose and wrote suggestions morning, noon and night. They had to make two collections a day to keep the boxes clear, and old McSweeney got it on his hands through a loan. He knew nothing about the business, and naturally he introduced a lot of impractical ideas that caused continual kicking."

"This is the prize safety valve for kickers," he said. "It relieves their minds without annoying anybody, and by the time they come here again they will have forgotten all about it."

"I don't know how it might have panned out, but after then he had a row with his bookkeeper and gave him notice to quit. To get even the bookkeeper sat down on the quiet and answered every letter, thanking each writer personally for his 'valuable suggestions' and assuring him it would be fully carried out next season, regardless of expense."

"I can't remember a tenth of the ideas advanced," continued the clerk, "but they were daisies. One crank wanted the house run on a strictly vegetarian basis, another wanted a vaudeville show every night in the parlors, a dozen or so insisted that the bar be entirely removed and a dozen more urged that it be kept open all night Sunday. One chap thought the dining room ought to be on the roof, several others advocated putting it in the basement, an astronomer insisted on a free observatory equipped in the tower, a sun cure idiot proposed inclosing the veranda with blue glass, a sports guest advised attaching a bowling alley to each bedroom and every last one of the whole gang was solemnly assured that he would find things exactly as he wanted 'em next year."

"Well, as soon as the house reopened trouble began. The first man that arrived asked where the captive balloon was that he had suggested for the lawn. The next one insisted on a howl for the Hungarian band he swore he had been promised, and from then on the place was in one continual uproar."

"Almost all the former guests turned up, but as soon as they found out that none of their ideas had been adopted they went away again and abused the house all over the country."

"Seeing his trade disappearing, McSweeney got desperate and actually tried to put a lot of the idiotic suggestions into execution. He turned the best porch into one raised a howl for the Hungarian band he swore he had been promised, and from then on the place was in one continual uproar."
